The irrevocable life insurance trust

Protecting the legacy you leave to your family.

Pass on more of the financial security you've created

If you hope to leave a legacy for your family, you should know that the assets that you've worked hard to accumulate could be substantially reduced by the federal estate tax upon your death. And in some states, state death taxes may also take a portion of your estate.

Life insurance can help preserve YOUR LEGACY.

Fortunately there is a way to provide death benefit proceeds upon your death and to potentially preserve more of your estate for your survivors.

An irrevocable life insurance trust (ILIT), named as the owner and beneficiary of a life insurance policy, is a time-tested method of providing your family with a death benefit when it is needed most. Though you have to prove your good health and be "insurable" today to qualify, and life insurance premiums are required, the benefits of establishing a life insurance trust today can outweigh the drawbacks associated with establishing and maintaining a trust, and buying life insurance. You should consult your estate planning attorney to discuss whether an ILIT would be appropriate for your situation.

Benefits of an irrevocable life insurance trust

- If the ILIT is properly drafted, established, funded, and administered, the death benefit paid to the ILIT should not be included in the taxable estate of the insured for federal estate tax purposes (and depending on the state may not be subject to state death taxes), as it would be if you owned your own policy.
- After your death, when money is needed most, life insurance provides death benefit proceeds to the trust and the proceeds are distributed pursuant to the terms of the trust.
- An ILIT is not subject to the probate process.
- The gifts to the ILIT will reduce the size of your estate, which will reduce federal (and potentially state) estate taxes.
- The ILIT can provide "control from the grave." The trustee will manage the assets in it after your death, making controlled distributions in the way that you indicated in the trust document. Therefore, you can potentially avoid having your children or other beneficiaries misuse the money after your death.

Special considerations

Like any other estate planning strategy you may use, there are certain limitations and special considerations you should know about and consider before establishing an ILIT to purchase life insurance:

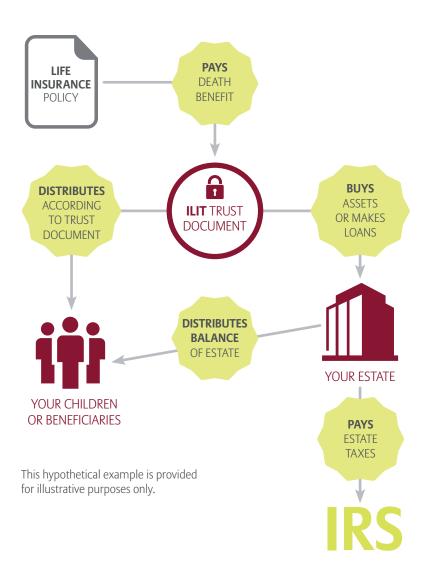

- You have to prove good health and be "insurable" to qualify for life insurance. For second-to-die life insurance, in most cases at least one spouse must be insurable.
 Keep in mind that most life insurance policies require both health and financial underwriting.
- You cannot terminate or change the trust once it has been established.
- Any cash value of the policy and other assets in the ILIT are not available for your access or use.
- Cash gifted to the ILIT is subject to federal and potentially state gift taxes depending on the amount of the gift and the availability of the annual gift tax exclusion(s) and lifetime exemption. You should consult with your estate planning attorney to assist with the potential gift tax issues.
- There are costs (i.e., legal fees, potential trustee costs, and costs associated with estate planning professionals) to establish and administer the trust, in addition to the charges in a life insurance policy.

This hypothetical example is provided for illustrative purposes only.

You establish your ILIT today by first talking to an attorney to draft the ILIT document. Then you would make gifts of cash to the ILIT. The trustee for the ILIT is named the owner and beneficiary of a life insurance policy on your life, or on the joint lives of you and your spouse.

How the irrevocable life insurance trust (ILIT) works when death benefit is paid.

Then after your death, or after the death of both you and your spouse (when second-to-die life insurance is purchased), the death benefit is paid income-tax-free to the ILIT. The cash in the ILIT can then be distributed as indicated in the trust document as a replacement for the cash used in the estate to pay the estate taxes. Alternatively, the ILIT can buy assets, or make loans to your estate, which would be used to pay the estate taxes. The property in the ILIT would be distributed as determined by the ILIT trust document.

Your financial professional is here to help.

Along with your legal counsel and accountant, your financial professional is an important resource for assistance in sorting through the complexities of legacy planning.

Your financial professional can help explain various factors involved with legacy planning and might be able to suggest customized solutions and strategies that honor the unique characteristics of your family. However, in many cases, he or she may only be able to suggest you discuss your situation with an attorney or tax advisor.

Inheritance and legacy strategies can present many financial and emotional challenges. But like all the milestones you reach together – births, graduations, and marriages – legacy planning is an opportunity that can bring you closer as a family.

Just keep the benefits and special considerations in mind and approach legacy planning one step at a time.

Talk to your attorney and financial professional to discuss whether an ILIT is appropriate for you.
